It is undoubtedly true that the wages id salaries of chrical positions have It is undoubtedly true that the wages and salaries of cierical positions have been reduced by the competition of wemen, and the whole social condition of the country would be improved if the women retired from the field find engaged in keeping up comfortable and happy homes, leaving the men to do all the work connected with trade and industry. It would result in higher pay for men and doubtless the advance in wages would be sufficient to enable the men workers to support in comfort the women who should retire from the field. But how can any system be devised whereby this result can be accomplished. There are thousands of women who are compelled to work for a living, and if they were shut out of the field there would be an immense amount of suffering and privation among persons who are now living in comparative comfort and contenument by reason of the wages carried by women. The prohibition of employment for women would be a severe hardship to such of them as depend on their labor for support.
